All communication! for the Editor to be addressed to the Office, 20, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.O. Vol. I. January, 1881. No. 7. Univocal English Words. Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte, who has bestowed the greatest possible care on his researches into English, collected from Smart's Dictionary a series of words, which he termed univocal (the place of the accent is determined by the correlative word equivocal, which no one calls equivo-cat), because they contain only one vowel. They are not strictly monosyllabic, because the Prince considered vocal r, l, m, n, in such words, as flare, squabWe, rhythm, ope-, not to be vowels, so that his list admits all such words. To each of these he gave the pronunciation assigned in Smart's Dictionary as the best authority he could find, not considering the observations of himself as a foreigner of any authority. But among these words are many which are obsolete, to which, therefore, no present value can be attached, those given by Smart being purely conjectural, assumed often from his own pronunciation of Latin, and, as is now known, not generally representing the sounds of the words at the times that they were in use. This list was kindly lent to me by the Prince in Dec., 1875, when I transcribed and rearranged...
